Acknowledgements

I am grateful to Dr. Prakash Kona, Associate Professor who supervised me throughout the period of research. The discussion we had on the political economy of communication in Indian context, the critical perspective and communication, the rise of television news channels in Andhra Pradesh and research methodology – all these things have helped me think critically. He gave me valuable inputs along with the liberty of thought and expression to pursue my topic dealing with the political economy of the media. Once again I thank him from the bottom of my heart for his support through these years.

I especially thank Dr. R. Srivatsan, Coordinator at Anveshi, Research Centre for Women’s Studies and Dr. Nikhila, Department of Film Studies and Visual Communication at EFL University, Hyderabad for the language and content editing and for suggestions with regard to revising chapters. Tremendous and generous contributions were made by people in order to collect data, discuss gray areas, and transcribe interviews from Telugu to English and for review of chapters.
